City, Nov. 12, 1896, Esther Ide Brewster; children: Eleanor Miller (8), Esther Armington (2). Went to New York City in 1880; later became very much interested in work for boys and girls, and in 1890 took a group of children to Freeville for the summer, and for five years thereafter different groups were taken each summer for an outing. In studying children and the work being done for them, came to the conclusion that giving the children everything they needed, free, tended to increase pauperism among them. While thinking over a remedy for this conceived the idea of starting a junior republic, modeled after the U. S. Government, and in 1895 put his ideas into operation. The plan worked so well and created so much interest that it was at once incorporated and placed on a permanent basis. The summer feature was abandoned and a permanent institution established, which is widely known as the George Junior Republic; now devoting entire time to establishment of the Junior Republic System. Independent in politics, with Republican tendencies. Recreations: All kinds of athletics. Address: Freeville, N. Y.
